RIVERS AND LAKES CONTAIN MANY FISH

Samuel B. Locke's Description of Idaho Waters Interesting to Sportsmen.

Special to The Tribune

OGDEN, March 7 .- It would be difficult to find throughout the United States a section which equals the head of the Salmon river, in the Sawtooth national forest of Idaho, for variety of fish of better couditions under which to propa gate fish, according to Samuel B. Locke. the forest examiner, of Hailey, Idaho who is engaged in detail work at the Fourth district headquarters. In addition to his knowledge of forestry. Mr. Locke is considered to be an expert on fish, and spends much time in studying the species to be found in the Idaho

Locke is considered to be an expert on fish, and spends much time in studying the species to be found in the Idaho streams and lakes.

Examiner Locke declares that good strings of buil trout are common from the Salmon river, but that the best fishing is in the lakes or their inlets. In his estimation the most striking feature of this section is the great possibility of introducing fish into waters not now stocked. Also, the great variety of conditions there and the abundant food make it an admirable place to introduce new species. Regarding his investigations throughout the Sawlooth forest reserve Mr. Locke today said:

There are at least twenty lakes well adapted to fish where none are found now owing to its being impossible for fish to reach them. Prospectors have introduced the cut-throat trout into some of these lakes and the fish have thrived wonderfully. There is also good fishing on the South Bolse, but the waters are not as well stocked as those of Wood river, nor do they present such a variety of fishing as the Salmon river. The placer mining in this section must be detrimental to fishing. Some very large full trout are taken there in the fall, even from the small streams. All the main streams which rise in the Sawtooth mountains are well supplied with fish. The importance of the fail, even from the small streams. All the main streams which rise in the Sawtooth mountains are well supplied with 10th. The importance of these fish as food is considerable, but perhaps their greatest value is the keen enloyment given the fisherman in their pursuit and capture. Fishing not only gives active sport in the pitting of one's skill against the wariness of the fish, but also in this section takes the fisherman through seenery of unequaled beauty. The redfish is found in the Sawtooth region only at the Redfish lakes. There are two forms of the large redfish, one the blue-back or sock-eye saimon, which weighs from three to seven pounds, found in Columbia river waters and other waters to the north; the other the small redfish, or Kennerly's salmon, ten to twelve inches long, weighing one-half pound, and found in the Redfish lakes in Idaho.
